RUFFA Gutierrez's new figure after undergoing BodyTite

'When Jinkee told my mom that Manny started being loyal to her [after BodyTite], I said to Dr. Belo, okay, let's do it!'

By Alex Y. Vergara

IN AN EXACTING industry where looks are everything, Ruffa Gutierrez is one lucky woman who seems immune so far to weight problems. But after giving birth to Lorin and Venice the normal way, the actress was dying to have a "tummy tuck" to get rid of loose, unsightly skin in her tummy area.

"I watch what I eat and lead an active lifestyle," she said during a recent media event for Belo Medical Group at [illegible] Manila's Salon de Ning. "But no amount of exercise could address loose skin."

But when she learned from Dr. Vicki Belo that the outmoded procedure is "major" in nature, Gutierrez soon had second thoughts about getting a tummy tuck. The procedure requires a cut from one end of the hip to the other to allow the doctor to lop off excess skin.

"I'm afraid of anything invasive, even in procedures," she said. "I've never had liposuction. And why would I allow myself to be cut and, in the process, get a long permanent scar after I've given birth twice naturally?"

Israeli technology

She was content to live with her loose (lower) skin until Belo offered her the option of undergoing BodyTite, an Israeli technology that melts out excess fat as it tightens loose skin. BMG has been offering the procedure for more than two years now.

The "semi-invasive" procedure, which Belo likened to laparoscopy to get rid of gallstones, requires a series of half-inch incisions to allow the doctor to insert the device. So-called incision marks, she assured, disappear within six months.

Like liposuction, the BodyTite device comes with a small cannula designed to suck out unwanted fat on problem areas. But unlike liposuction, BodyTite's cannula is connected to a small machine that sends out radio frequency waves that seem to seal

Is belief in relics nothing but superstition?

INNER AWARENESS

Jaime T. Licauco

RELICS OF Jesus Christ and other holy persons, such as his apostles, the saints, and martyrs of the Catholic Church, used to be regarded with great reverence and respect by the early church fathers. They are carefully kept in elaborately adorned reliquaries, and some are displayed only on special occasions. A priest could not begin to say mass unless the altar contained a relic of Jesus Christ or a saint.

But this does not seem to be the case anymore. According to a well-known historian, Ambeth Ocampo, a former Benedictine Monk, "At best, relics are souvenirs of a saintly life." They "should not be considered miraculous, neither should they be worshipped as the practice borders on superstition."

"This seems to be the current trend of the church concerning relics, because a Canon Law expert, Fr. Jerome Marquez, SVD, whom I interviewed on my Sunday radio program on DZRM last May 1, revealed that the church no longer requires that a relic of a saint be placed on the altar before a priest can say mass.

But if relics are no longer important, why does the church still classify relics into first class (i.e. a part of a holy person's body, such as bone, skin, hair, blood); second class (i.e. objects closely associated with the saint, such as his or her clothing, other personal effects); and third class (i.e. objects he or she has touched or held)?

The fact is, whether the Church admits it or not, every living creature, or any object, for that matter, has vibrations or energy patterns. Anything we come in contact with or touch bears our energy pattern or psychic imprint. And this is the reason why certain primitive people refuse to shake hands with strangers, or have their pictures taken. They believe something of themselves would be lost or transferred to the other.

Western scientific minded persons consider such beliefs mere superstition with no rational or objective basis. Yet, these primitive people intuitively or instinctively know they are right.

> Will the vibrations, energy pattern or psychic imprint of an object be the same, whether it was touched by a saint or sinner?

I know that this is not easy to understand. The closest I can get to explaining this belief in as objective a manner as possible is to introduce the Sanskrit word "akasha," which has no English equivalent. The usual or nearest translation of "akasha" is "space" or perhaps, better still, "space-time." Everything that has happened to an individual and the entire universe is recorded in the akasha.

Time and space

According to the American mystic and prophet, Edgar Cayce, the akashic record contains information that is written by each of us "in the skein of time and space." A psychic who can read the akashic record will know everything that is hidden, no secrets can be kept from him or her. Perhaps this is what Jesus Christ meant when he said that "what is hidden will be revealed."

If everything in the universe can be reduced to its ultimate substance or essence, what would remain is the akasha. The akasha, therefore, is the substratum of all matter. It is even smaller or more fundamental than a particle in quantum physics. Each person created his own akashic record from the time he is born to the time he dies. Everything that he has thought, seen, felt, smelled, tasted, and touched is recorded in the akasha. And it cannot be erased because it is not on the physical plane.

Perhaps the akashic record is what the Christians refer to as the "Book of Life," which St. Peter is supposed to consult when a person dies to see if he deserves to enter heaven or be condemned to hell. For who else could that Book of Life be?

Now, what has all this got to do with relics? Let me ask you a very simple, common-sense question: Will the vibrations, energy pattern, or psychic imprint of an object be the same, whether it was touched by a saint or sinner, by a holy person like Pope John Paul II... or by a serial killer like the Boston Strangler?

Every time you hold or touch an object, you leave something of yourself on that object, which can be read accurately by a psychic through psychometry. There's a great deal of documented literature about this relatively unknown psychic ability or power in man.

It is not mere superstition therefore to believe that a relic of a holy man or a saint can bring about real healing, which is not merely psychological. By the way, since I had the rare opportunity to meet Blessed John Paul II personally at the Vatican in 1986 and shake hands with him, I can, therefore, be classified as a third class relic. Right, [illegible]?

THE MVP Unleashed Challenge started with a biking challenge in Davao

Participants in Pharmaton MVP Unleashed Challenge complete race of a lifetime

PHARMATON, THE leading multivitamins plus minerals brand, recently wrapped up the first ever Pharmaton MVP Unleashed Challenge, the brand's month-long quest for outstanding prowess of body, physical and mental strength.

Covering all three major island groups in the country, the Pharmaton MVP Unleashed Challenge brought together five individuals—Anthony Campo, TJ Ida, Chuck Mariano, Pepe Remigio, and Moritz Torres—in a fierce battle.

THE FIVE MVPs with Boehringer Ingelheim Philippines group product manager [illegible]

Each participant, with extensive training in running, swimming, biking, trekking, mountain climbing, and adventure racing, embarked on an epic journey over 5,176 km of the entire archipelago for 28 days.

After completing all tasks, the challengers' cumulative time was tallied to determine the winners. Ida emerged on top, followed by Torres, Remigio, Campo, and Mariano.

Ida took home the P500,000 top prize. Torres, Remigio, Campo, and Mariano won P250,000, P150,000, P100,000 and P50,000, respectively.

Ida comes into the competition with a string of awards from some of the toughest competitions here and abroad. He's into adventure racing, mountaineering, rock climbing, surfing, and, of course, triathlons.

In addition, Pharmaton also awarded an additional P50,000 to Ida for being the Pharmaton MVP People's Choice Award.

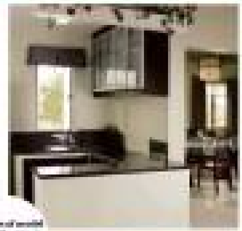

Summing up the experience, Ida admitted that he gained more than just another feather to his cap. "A healthy mind and a healthy body can get you through any challenge," he said.

Pharmaton was on hand to give Ida and the rest of the challengers that extra boost needed to complete the challenge. With its unique Ginseng G11 formulation, Pharmaton provides the necessary health supplement the body needs, while also keeping the mind alert and more responsive, allowing the body to function completely.

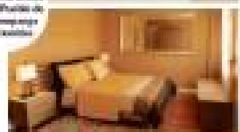

Proper training prepared the contestants for their task. As Campo and Mariano simply put it, "Practice consistently, improve your weak points, conquer your fears... and don't forget to take Pharmaton every day."
